Fruit Fly Genetics: First-Principles Questions

Question 1

Place the three fly crosses in an appropriate order from the most to the least to reflect your knowledge regarding their genotypes. Evaluate your results by using the provided table structure on page 2.

Three fly crosses involving white eye (w) and ebony (e) mutations (from Drosophila melanogaster) are listed below. The phenotypes for eye color are determined by a single gene, in which the dominant allele encodes red eyes and the recessive allele encodes white eyes. The same technique is employed to determine the order of dominance for the two mutations. Indicate the order of the crosses in the table below.

As you place the crosses in the table, you will be determining the genotypes of the parents and offspring. The crosses themselves are represented by the numbers 1-3 and the genotypes are listed in the table below. Indicate the order of the crosses in the table below.

	White-eyed Male	White-eyed Female	White-eyed Male	White-eyed Female	White-eyed Female
1	1	1	1	1	1

The next question asks you to determine the order of dominance for the two mutations based on the results of the crosses.

	White-eyed Male	White-eyed Female	White-eyed Male	White-eyed Female	White-eyed Female
1	1	1	1	1	1

1. Determine the phenotypes of the progeny of the crosses (if possible) with respect to the mutation. The two alleles of the gene are assumed to be in a heterozygous state. Explain your results from the parents' genotypes using the Mendelian rules of inheritance. Which cross should come before which when ordering the crosses in the table? (Remember that the eye color mutation for Drosophila is recessive to red, and the female offspring are phenotypically red and white from their eye color inheritance.)

2. Based on the information about dominance, which mutation is more likely to be dominant or recessive? Explain your answer (and justify). Show all your work, including the genotypes of your individuals. (Do separate genotypes or alleles in the parent boxes for the parents?)
