Abstract—Evaluating the efficiency of human-AI interactions is challenging, including subjective and objective quality aspects. With the focus on the human experience of the explanations, evaluations of explanation methods have become mostly subjective, making comparative evaluations almost impossible and highly linked to the individual user. However, it is commonly agreed that one aspect of explanation quality is how effectively the user can detect if the predictions are trustworthy and correct, i.e., if the explanations can increase the user’s appropriate trust in the model. This paper starts with the definitions of appropriate trust from the literature. It compares the definitions with model performance evaluation, showing the strong similarities between appropriate trust and model performance evaluation. The paper’s main contribution is a novel approach to evaluating appropriate trust by taking advantage of the likenesses between definitions. The paper offers several straightforward evaluation methods for different aspects of user performance, including suggesting a method for measuring uncertainty and appropriate trust in regression.

I. INTRODUCTION

Artificial intelligence (AI) has become a universal component of decision support systems (DSSs) across various domains, such as retail or defence [1]. These AI-based predictive models are generally very accurate but are often opaque and lack transparency and comprehensibility, making it difficult for users to understand how predictions are generated. Furthermore, there is a risk that models may become biased based on something in the data, leading to erroneous predictions. Thus, it is crucial that these models are designed to provide explanations of their predictions, enabling users to detect and correct potential errors. The lack of transparency in DSSs can otherwise lead to low acceptance and mistrust of such systems [2]. The risks of a lack of transparency have been highlighted in regulations from numerous government initiatives, such as the European Guidelines for Trustworthy AI [3], which emphasise the need for accountability, transparency, and human oversight in AI systems.

Explainable artificial intelligence (XAI) is a field dedicated to creating AI systems that can explain their rationale to human users. The goal of XAI is to provide explanations that characterise the strengths and weaknesses of the underlying model and communicate how it will behave in the future [4], [5]. However, evaluating the quality of explanations can be challenging, as it involves the interaction between humans and machines, requiring multiple aspects of quality to be considered [6].

The motivation for this work is twofold. Firstly, the area is in dire need of rigour for definitions and benchmarks of objective metrics to evaluate the interaction between humans and computers in explanations. There are a plethora of subjective measurements to use [7], making it challenging to conduct comparative evaluations. One metric, called appropriate trust, has recently risen as a promising solution to the problem by measuring user reliance, resulting from the subjective criteria. Although the meaning behind appropriate trust is generally understood as accurate trust in the predictions, the researchers are still left to find their own methodology for evaluating different aspects of the metric since formalised definitions of the method are almost absent [8]. Secondly, by defining straightforward and easy-to-follow methods of evaluating various elements of appropriate trust, the rigour in the area is strengthened, and comparative evaluations become possible.

The main contributions of this paper are:

- The proposal of a well-formulated method for evaluating appropriate trust, which can facilitate more accurate and consistent assessments of user performance.
- To address the challenge of evaluating user interaction with explanation methods, the paper proposes well-defined methods for measuring misuse or disuse in a user evaluation.
- In addition, the paper also suggests a method for measuring uncertainty in regression during user evaluations.

The rest of the paper is organised as follows: the next section reviews fundamental concepts related to explanation methods. Moreover, it provides an introduction to evaluation of model performance. Section III presents earlier definitions and usage of appropriate trust, while Section IV defines methods for measuring misuse and disuse. Section V introduces uncertainty estimation for regression. In Section VI the metrics are exemplified with the results from a user evaluation. The paper ends with a discussion, followed by concluding remarks.
