Genetically Modified Food: Is the Food Industry Serving Up Poison?

Science is always on the move — unveiling new insights and technologies that hold promise to solving today's medical mysteries. And doctors should also be on the move — following these updates on nutrition, healthcare, and common diseases. These updates are available from the flood of medical news we are so fortunate to have in the 21st century.

Every month, scientific and medical journals publish thousands of articles describing the results of thousands of studies conducted all over the world. We are lucky to be living in the information age — spawned by the advent of the Internet.

From my own point of view on this wealth of information, I am now in the process of co-authoring a scientific book on the subject of autism, and I have to marvel at the amount of scientific and clinical literature that has been written on this subject. And autism is just a single disorder.

This is a testament to the enormous amount of data, analysis, clinical studies, general knowledge, and observations that are flowing out of our medical centers and research facilities. It is truly mind-boggling.

It has been said that we have enough information from worldwide studies to cure cancer, but no one has sifted through all of the information and put it into a clinically usable form.

When I meet (or receive e-mails from) people I have helped with so-called "incurable" diseases, I am not only pleased, but it reaffirms my contention that the answers to many of these diseases are already out there.

The problem is that there are just so few people who know what the information means.

What the Experts Miss

For example, in reviewing the massive amount of research concerning atherosclerosis, (the clogging of arteries) over the past 60 years, it immediately became obvious to me that traditional science had missed the boat — cholesterol was not the cause. It was obvious
