- Discuss how the design of the Forbidden City created and fostered ceremony and ritual in Chinese Imperial court society.
 - The Forbidden City was designed and built in a way that embodies traditional Chinese luxurious architecture, with the attention on articulation and bilateral symmetry to indicate balance. The meticulous symmetry of the palace's design symbolized the order that the Ming emperor, the Son of Heaven, delivered to the world. Therefore, his throne room was located at the very center of that world. The palace provided an impeccable setting for the most intricate ritual of the Ming court due to the highly restricted access to the inner compound. For example, the entrance gateway to the complex, called the Noon Gate, has five different portals. The central doorway was only to be used by the emperor. Only the imperial family and other high officials were allowed to enter through the two entrances to the left and right of the complex whereas others had to use the outermost passageways. Entrance to the Forbidden City proper was through the nearly 40-yard-tall triple-passageway Meridian Gate, through which only the Son of Heaven and his retinue and foreign ambassadors who had been granted an official audience could pass.

- What is porcelain and why was it important to Chinese culture?
 - By the Yuan period, Chinese potters had extended their mastery to fully developed porcelains. No other Chinese art technique and/or form has accomplished such extensive adoration, inspired such imitation, or took place so frequently in the everyday lives as porcelain. In China, porcelain-like stoneware materialized during the Tang dynasty. Like stoneware, true porcelain objects are fired in a kiln at an extremely high temperature until the clay fully merges into a compressed, solid material resembling stone or glass. Ceramists create porcelain from a fine white clay called kaolin mixed with ground petuntse. Porcelain is the productive fruit of the working people of ancient China. Since the Han and Tang Dynasties, porcelain has been exported from all over the world. It advances economic and cultural exchange between China and the outside world, and greatly influences the traditional culture and lifestyle of people from other countries.

- How are Chinese gardens designed differently than gardens from other cultures?
 - In the Forbidden City, everything including the gardens are highly organized and they reflect the order that the Son of Heavens brings to the world. The Ming gardens at Suzhou are among the most valued and beloved examples of landscape architecture anywhere in the world. Chinese gardens blend unique architectures with natural elements such as fantastic rock-work. The gardens are constructed to recreate and miniaturize larger natural landscapes, the typical
