

Chapter 4 Sensation and Perception illusion - perception in which the way we perceive a stimulus does not match its physical reality sensation - refers to the detection of physical energy by our sense organs, including our eyes, ears, skin, nose, and tongue, which then relay info to the brain.

perception - is the brain's interpretation of these raw sensory inputs.

Transduction - a process by which the nervous system converts an external stimulus, like light or sound, into electrical signals within neurons sense receptor - a specialized cell responsible for converting external stimuli into neural activity for a specific sensory system sensory adaption - a process in which activation is greatest when a stimulus is first detected psychophysics - the study of how we perceive sensory stimuli based on their physical characteristics absolute threshold - the lowest level of a stimulus we can detect on 50 percent of the trials when no other stimuli of that type are present just noticeable difference (JND) - is the smallest change in the intensity of a stimulus that we can detect

Weber's law - states that there is a constant proportional relationship between the JND and the original stimulus intensity

- the stronger the stimulus, the bigger the change needed for a change in stimulus intensity to be noticeable signal detection theory (David Green and John Swets, 1966) - theory on how we detect stimuli under different conditions
