Book : Plant Design and Economics for Chemical Engineers, M.S. Peters and K. D. Timmerhaus
Chapter 10 (4th Edition)

- A new project, such as constructing and operating a new chemical plant requires a commitment of capital funds
- The resources required to undertake a project are always limited. Therefore, the resources should be used in an appropriate and efficient manner. A wise investor selects investments that are expected to maximise the return from the capital that is available
- A proposed investment must be evaluated for its economic feasibility
- Before capital is invested in a project or enterprise, it is necessary to know how much profit can be obtained from an investment and whether or not it might be more advantageous to invest the capital in another form of investment.

The term 'profitability' is used as the general term for the measure of the amount of profit that can be obtained from a given situation

- The basic aim of the profitability analysis is to give a measure of the attractiveness of a project for comparison with other possible project options
- Thus, the determination and analysis of profits obtainable from the investment among alternatives are the major goals of economic analysis
