

QUESTION 1

In practice, the two methods of depreciation designed to approximate straight-line are the sum-of-years-digits method and the double-declining-balance method. In each case, the total depreciation will equal the original cost of the asset, which is the original cost less any salvage value.

The straight-line method for the 10-year asset requires the use of a constant value of $10,000. In contrast, the sum-of-years-digits method uses the 10-year asset, and the double-declining-balance method uses the 10-year asset to determine the value of the asset. The following table shows the results of the sum-of-years-digits method. The amounts are based on the 10-year asset.

Example 1: The 10-year asset is depreciated over 10 years. The straight-line method uses the 10-year asset and the double-declining-balance method uses the 10-year asset. The results are based on the 10-year asset. The results are based on the 10-year asset.
