

Developmental Psychology

Developmental Psychology is a branch of psychology that deals with the changes that occur in human beings as they transpire from childhood through to adulthood. Such changes are measured in close consideration to emotions, social, economic, cultural and cognitive aspects of human development. Developmental Psychology came into existence in as early as 19th century and mainly focused on studying the processes and stages of child development. One of the most commendable and worthwhile figures who contributed to the historical sprout and strength of the Developmental Psychology was Charles Darwin. Darwin used his theory of natural selection to explain the factors that drives human physical and psychological development. Charles Darwin testified that every developmental change occurring in human must be effected by environmental factors surrounding the particular human being (Berk, 2010). Right from childhood to adulthood, human beings learn to adapt in particular environmental conditions and practices due to the pressure exerted upon them the concepts of selection.

As argued by Darwin, human emotions, social and cultural behaviors are all depended upon the activities taking place within the surrounding environment. Darwin's contribution in this developmental theory of psychology insists on changes in human development as the only ways that shapes individuals behaviors in conformity to the demand of the environment that eventually leads to survival. The choice for Darwin is due to his exemplary presentation of the famous theory of natural selection and linking it to the concepts of the human development to result to succinct and conclusive finding on how developmental changes are dependent on environment.
