

Essay questions for Darwin's Challenge: Writing Assessment Placement Test

Evolutionary biologists challenge Darwin's prediction that big effects on sex ratios should be associated with phenotypic differences between siblings. The biggest challenge comes from the fact that parents do not have equal investment in their offspring. Specifically, they invest more in their sons than in their daughters and this is a direct result of the fact that males are more expensive to raise than females are. What are the costs of raising males and females?

The concept of the cost of raising males and females is central to the theory of parental investment and sibling competition. Darwin's prediction that sex ratios should be equal is based on the fact that parents invest equal amounts in their sons and daughters. However, this is not true because males are more expensive to raise than females are. This is because males are more expensive to raise than females are because they are larger and require more resources to raise. This is why parents invest more in their sons than in their daughters.

Why do you think parents invest more in their sons than in their daughters? What are the costs of raising males and females? How do these costs affect the sex ratio of offspring? What are the implications of these findings for the theory of parental investment and sibling competition?
