

Exercise 3-2: Population Evolution

The Evolution of Populations

Evolution is the genetic change occurring in a population of organisms over many generations. So what is a population? A population is all of the members of a single species in a given area at a given time. So by the definition of evolution and what a population is, we now know that individual organisms do not evolve but populations do.

We know that we get phenotypes from genotypes and that genotypes have alleles. All of the alleles at all of the gene loci in all individuals of a population is called a gene pool. The amount of each allele in the gene pool is known as the allele frequency.
